The Powder Horn

Fall 2022

Welcome to the Fall 2022 edition of The Powder Horn, the quarterly newsletter for the 1860 Club. The 1860 Club is named after the year the Regiment was founded, and represents over 160 years of sacrifice and service to Canada during times of conflict and peace. The 1860 Club is intended to connect all elements of the QOR of C Regimental Family: the serving Regiment; the Band and Bugles; the Regimental Association and its Branches; the QOR of C (2881) Cadets; the Regimental Museum; The Senate; the Trust Fund, and other supporters of the Regiment.

Commanding Officer's Update

The month of August was another month of great accomplishment for the unit. As summer training courses ended, we were reminded of the drive and ambition of our members. We qualified three new Platoon Commanders: 2Lt Bjurstrom, 2Lt Pan and 2Lt Ye. 2Lt Bjurstrom was named top candidate for the course. We also qualified 11 new Riflemen, with Rfn Wrobel being the top candidate. Cpls Heinle, Teper and Wanke qualified as Infantry Section Commanders, with Cpl Wanke as runner-up to the top candidate. In addition, Cpls Hsieh, Rfn Mohamed and Rfn Balint were awarded CO's coins for their actions in providing first-aid and scene management during a vehicle accident this summer in Petawawa.

From August 20th to 27th, many of our members attended Exercise Stalwart Guardian in Petawawa. The unit had the largest attendance within 32 CBG. Members participated in offensive operations at the section and platoon level, including Airmobile operations.

On August 28th, I had the opportunity to attend the 99th Birthday Party for George Beardshaw in London, Ontario. George is one of our last two World War 2 veterans left. He was awarded the Légion d'honneur (Legion of Honour) by Colonel Roger Vandomme, Deputy Defence Attaché for France and long-time friend of the Regiment. Special thanks to Master of Ceremonies, CWO (Ret'd) Brian Budden, Toronto Branch Association President and Capt (Ret'd) John Howie, the Association Padre.

Operation Rha is planned for October 8th to the 16th and will see 30 members of the Regiment travel to the Netherlands to participate in the headstone dedication for Lt John Kavanagh in Steenderen. Members will also visit the Breskens Pocket, Groesbeek and several of our memorials in the north of the country. Special thanks to HLCOL (Ret'd) Lionel Goffart for his support of this privately funded trip, as this is the 4th commemorative visit he has supported.

The Origin and Evolution of Rifle Regiments (2/4)

Editors note : This is the second article by Lt Anthony Simokovic, CD in a series of four short historical pieces associated with military history and figures of importance to the Regiment.

Illustration: Rfn Plunkett in 1809.

1809, on a frigid January day in northeast Spain, a shot rings out from an impossible distance. A French General drops from his horse and a spry Rifleman armed with a Baker casually reloads to dispatch the Aide-de-Camp running to check on his fallen General. Rifleman Plunkett of the 1st Battalion 95th Rifles executed a near-perfect application of the rifle in the era of smooth-bore muskets, setting the example for Riflemen for generations to come.

Continuing our series on the history of Rifle Regiments and Riflemen, we delve into what is arguably the most important period for us – the Peninsula Campaign. During the Peninsula Campaign green-jacketed soldiers and their novel tactics earned the respect and admiration of many in the British Army; foremost was that of the Duke of Wellington. Conversely, Riflemen instilled dread in their opponents, the previously unbeatable French Army. Their nickname for the Rifles was “Les Sauterelles” or “Grasshoppers” because of the Rifles’ green jackets and quick skirmishing movements, that were uncharacteristic of Redcoats. This entry will touch upon two key battles of the Peninsular Campaign; the Siege of Badajoz and the Battle of Nivelle.

Rifle Regiments served in the Iberian Peninsula from the very beginning of the campaign, including acting as rearguard to General Moore’s force during the Battle of Corunna (where he would lose his life). When operations restarted in earnest, the Rifle Regiments of Wellington’s army were dispersed; companies from the 60th Regiment (Rifles) were dispersed to each division, whereas the 95th was concentrated in the Light Division. Regardless of their employment, these Rifle regiments were considered elite and were often seen at the forefront of actions throughout the campaign, from Talavera in 1809 onward.

The Siege of Badajoz was considered by many to be one of the most ferocious battles of the Napoleonic Wars, and certainly the bloodiest in the Peninsula. Badajoz was a frontier town with a castle, a fortified town surrounded by a curtain wall and bastions, and several outlying forts. The British required Badajoz to secure the lines of communication to Lisbon, and its capture allowed Wellington to advance into Spain leading to the Battle of Salamanca in July of 1812. The siege commenced in mid-March 1812 and continued until early April. During that time Wellington's army of 27,000 constructed earthworks, trench lines and mines around the fortress, often while under fire from the French garrison inside.

The Rifles were the perfect antidote to countering the harassing fire from French lines, as they were often able to outmatch the range of French muskets and were trained to maneuver into advantageous positions for perfect shot placement as opposed to tactics of the Red Coated line infantry. Using these principles, one Rifleman from the 95th, George Simmons was able to keep a French battery pinned for almost an entire day. The 95th were also key in repeatedly repelling French raids. Badajoz however was a meat-grinder, and when it came time to storm the fortress, the Riflemen of the various regiments and battalions formed to be part of the assaulting parties, some even manning the "Forlorn Hope" - those that volunteered to be first onto the breach.

By late 1813 Wellington's forces were pursuing Marshal Soult's army into France. After the French failure to relieve the Siege of San Sebastian on the 31st of August 1813, they fell back to defensive positions on the French-Spanish Border. To this point in the Peninsular Campaign, the Light Division of Wellington's Army had proven itself an elite formation, often winning the day for the Allies. The Battle of Nivelle on 10 November 1813 would be no different. The French had fortified a series of hilltops and ridges near the Nivelle River in the Pyrenees, putting them directly in the axis of advance of Wellington's allied army. The 95th had been selected to begin operations at night, driving French sentries back into their lines and creating freedom of movement for the follow-on forces of the Division.

In what was described later by 95th officer Sir Harry Smith, as “the most beautiful attack in the history of war”, the Riflemen in skirmish order worked their way along the ridgelines laying down suppressive fire at great range for the entirety of the battle whilst Light and Line infantry maneuvered against the French forts and redoubts.

These two battles are but vignettes in the long campaign against Napoleon’s forces in the Peninsula that highlight some of the exploits of our Rifle genealogy. The next installment of this series will focus on the Waterloo Campaign, where the 95th, and the Riflemen of the King’s German Legion (a British rifle regiment) use their rifles and tactical acumen to achieve key tactical victories that ultimately aided in the overall victory against Napoleon and his regime.

Book Recommendation

Not Bad for a Sergeant: The Memoirs of Barney Danson

by HLCOL Barney Danson

"Barney Danson began as a twenty-one-year-old sergeant in the Canadian army and rose to the lofty heights of parliamentary secretary to Pierre Trudeau and, eventually, Minister of National Defence. In these positions, he gained insights into previously unknown facts about this remarkable prime minister, and he gives an insider's view of Canadian politicians and world leaders. Danson's own story, told in a touching and often humorous tone, is also the story of a generation of Canadians who faced the hardships of the Depression, the reality of war, and the many changes that followed."

The QOR Association

On 20 August 2022, the QOR Association represented the Regiment at the 100th Annual Warriors' Day Parade. The contingent was led by Gerry Senetchko, and marched with QOR band members who were part of the 32 Canadian Brigade Group Band. The event also had Association members as Parade Marshals, including the Chief Parade Marshal Brian Budden. Throughout the Canadian National Exhibition, soldiers from the QOR introduced our military to the public as part of the Armed Forces Display.
